NOTICES OF FANTINE.
"A book with a thought in it. . . . Something fearful even though the glorious . . . . Victor Hugo is an exile ten years from his native land, because he is a republican, and will not cringe to the despotism which, through perfidy, usurpation, treason, and murder, clutched and still grasps her tightly by the throat. An author who early won distinction in the field of imaginative literature, has kept silence, or broken it only in poetry, for the last quarter of a century. As he speaks, and the intellectual world bends forward and strives to catch his first breathings, it well may. He deserves the old but ever new question—Legal Justice, does it right more than it wrong? Xun persons and penalties do they tend to induce penance and reformation, or to harden offenders into ruffians? Your stern and frowning Vises does it was the error to make the way of evil, or real and drive them into calumny and irreconcileable depravity? Such are the problems which this poet and epicur discusses with inexorable resolution. His indictment of Society is the broadest, the blackest, the most unceasing, that has ever yet been drawn."—Horace Greeley in The N. Y. Tribune.

"No book has ever so delighted by the public since 'Uncle Tom's Cabin.' Edition after edition disappears like snowflakes on the water. It is the greatest sensation of the day in literary circles, and I do not wonder at it, for it contains all the elements that would naturally excite enthusiasm and stir the soul of readers of all classes to their very depths."—Paris Correspondent of The N. Y. Evening Post.

"'Les Misérables' is an immortal work, and must forever take its place among the manifestations of genius by fiction. His great moral sense would be sufficient to maintain it. Be it true, or be it not true, it will remain as powerfully as a declination of what one of the most eminent among the political and social writers of this age thought of its conditions, and so long as the discussions of the questions which involve its truth shall continue, opportunities will be presented for admiration of its many beauties as a work of art."—London Literary Budget.

"Victor Hugo has laid a live coal upon the heart of man. The first part of his new work 'Les Misérables,' recently published in Paris, is not alone a work of genius. It is an expression as truly divine as that Gospel which can proclaim peace on earth and good will to men."—N. Y. Sunday Times.

"One could call it a gallery of vivid photographs of the life of to-day. He touches the great burning questions that divide society and law, who a master hand which has few rivals."—N. Y. Evening Post.

"This long expected romance reads like a feverish dream. We confess to reading its hundred and fifty octavo pages through a single sitting."—Boston Transcript.

"A wonderful book—essentially no work of ancient or modern times has created so great sensation at the start as this last novel of Victor Hugo. In beauty, in plasticity, in pathos, in power of dramatic expression, in delineation of character, and analysis of mind and motive, the book has altogether no peer among the best novels of the day."—[Ains and Arns.]

"His burning words can scarcely fail to excite both compassion and sympathy, and will be the means of encouraging the benevolent in their efforts to restrain the young, to reprove the selfish, and to raise the fallen."—N. Y. Christian Times.

"'Les Misérables' has been written to do good. It is sublime as a work, and thrillingly terrible in its pathos."—School of the Americas.

"The great production of unquestioned and exalted genius, which is destined to mark a new era—a revival—the higher social condition, not of France alone, but of all nations. In our time, has strength begun to appear. The first part of the romance-drama, under the title of 'Fantine,' has already been distributed by myriads of copies all over Christendom."—[N. Y. Daily Times.]

"This is the great book of the century. Were not the country shepherds in war it would create a greater furor than has ever been excited on this side of the water by any product of the press. The momentary popularity of Uncle Tom's Cabin would be far eclipsed. In Europe its publication is termed the most remarkable event since the battle of Waterloo. Three original French editions have been published in France, Belgium, and Germany, and it has already been translated into English, German, Spanish, Portuguese, Italian, Low Dutch, Polish and Hungarian. The rush for it in Paris on the publishing day of the second part, Cosette, when forty-eight thousand volumes were distributed by Pagnier (the Paris publisher) alone, was greater than a force of police was necessary to preserve order. The amount paid to the author, four hundred thousand francs ($60,000), for the copyright, is equally unparalleled."—[N. Y. Daily Transcript.]

"In this volume lies one of the noblest monuments ever built by human genius to humanity itself, and the person who misses it ignores one of the sensations of the age."—N. Y. Atlas.

"The literary sensation of the day—indeed of our time—is the publication of 'Les Misérables.'—[New-York Leader.]
